

that Field Marshal Oyama has not retreated the city itself, but is directing every effort to cut off the enemy's retreat.

City Possibly Burning.

It is reported that the city is burning. If this be true, it is believed that the blaze was caused accidentally by shell fire or through the Russians igniting stores which they were unable to remove.

The city is known to be strongly fortified, for which reason it is not likely that the Japanese would attempt to carry it by assault until it had been isolated.

The fate of the Russian army is regarded as hanging on the ability of the left wing to keep the General Kuroki while the main body is falling back toward Mukden. General Kuropatkin is known to have greatly strengthened his left for this purpose, and it is believed that the operations now going on at Hsinyang, fifteen miles northeast of Liao-Yang, are directed at overcoming its resistance.

Fight Was Furious.

It is stated that there was a furious fighting there throughout Friday. General Kuroki has been unable to find a position whence his guns will dominate the railway. His troops are weary and his horses are tired. The men have been marching since August 23. Nevertheless they are attacking the Russians in a spirited manner.

Field Marshal Oyama has reported that General Oku's army, forming the left, intended to press the enemy toward the Taitsie River, beginning this morning. The Taitsie is flooded and is unfordable. For that reason it is possible that numbers of the Russians will be driven into the river and drowned.

Big Russian Losses.

It is expected that when the details are known it will be found that the Russian losses from this attack will be immense. The Japanese casualty list continues to swell. There is every likelihood that the Japanese will have the bloodiest since the Franco-Prussian war.

The Japanese casualties since Monday, when the assault upon the Russian positions began, are officially estimated at 10,000.

It is rumored that General Ogawa, commanding the fourth division, was wounded yesterday.

The "Asahi" thinks that the Russians directed their main force against the Japanese central army (General Kodaira), thus weakening their line at other points and enabling General Kuroki an Oku to make a rapid advance on the flanks. It terms the operations the most colossal since Sedan.

Official Report Meager.

The czar has received a dispatch from General Kuropatkin, but as it was announced by the war office it threw little light on the real situation. It announced that the fighting about Liao-Yang continued yesterday without cessation and that the Russians fell back.

Their losses were about 5,000. It also announced that General Kuroki crossed the Taitsie River and was attacking the Russian left. Some positions on the right were taken.

Newspapers at Sea.

The newspapers furnish curious reading. From some of the articles the readers must infer that the arrival of the Japanese at Liao-Yang inevitably involved them in disaster. One even went so far as to discuss the terms of peace that Russia would dictate to Japan, to which it was impossible to show any clemency owing to her barbarous methods of warfare.

Prices on the bourse were the lowest they have been since the beginning of the war.

Critics Say Little.

LONDON, Sept. 3.—The essence of the war news is contained in the brief official dispatches issued at Tokyo and St. Petersburg. Beyond them almost everything is based on rumor and conjecture. Critics whose views are of any real value say little, merely pointing to the results which will obviously follow equally obvious contingencies. Other commentators write with many adjectives of the Russian general's tactics.

Beitard accounts of the fighting preliminary to the great struggle now in progress which have arrived from the Russian headquarters in the field add little to what is known. The "Post" correspondent, beyond the fact that the Japanese had abandoned their positions, a position south of Liao-Yang, they destroyed a bridge 200 yards long across the Shiao River. This does not seem to have hindered the pursuit by the Japanese.

Kuropatkin's Plans.

A mailed interview with General Kuropatkin which he granted to the correspondent of the "Daily Graphic" at the end of June, when the Russian commander-in-chief was at Tashkent, is printed. It may possibly have some bearing on the position in the field today.

The correspondent quotes General Kuropatkin as saying, in a calm, quiet manner, free of all display, that his tactics were to try to arrest the progress of the enemy toward the railway as long as was possible, and then, when at his disposal would allow the strength of the army, the general said, was daily increasing. The railway was exceeding all expectations, but there was still much to be done before the Russian advance could begin.

Expect to Win Yet.

It was too soon to talk of this movement, but this much was certain, that the time would come when a sufficient force would be collected to win back what had been lost. Until then endurance, courage, and patience were needed. By degrees all the friends of Russia would realize that every step of the numerical strength of the Russian forces in the Far East and that the resistance against the far superior strength of the enemy had surpassed all expectations that could rightly be entertained. It was the first and foremost question of the time when the present state of affairs in Manchuria would be altered.

"Until then," concluded General Kuropatkin, "Russia and her friends must have patience, patience, patience."

FROM THE YALU TO LIAO-YANG

General Kuroki crossed the Yalu River from Korea to Manchuria on April 20 and defeated the Russian army the next day.

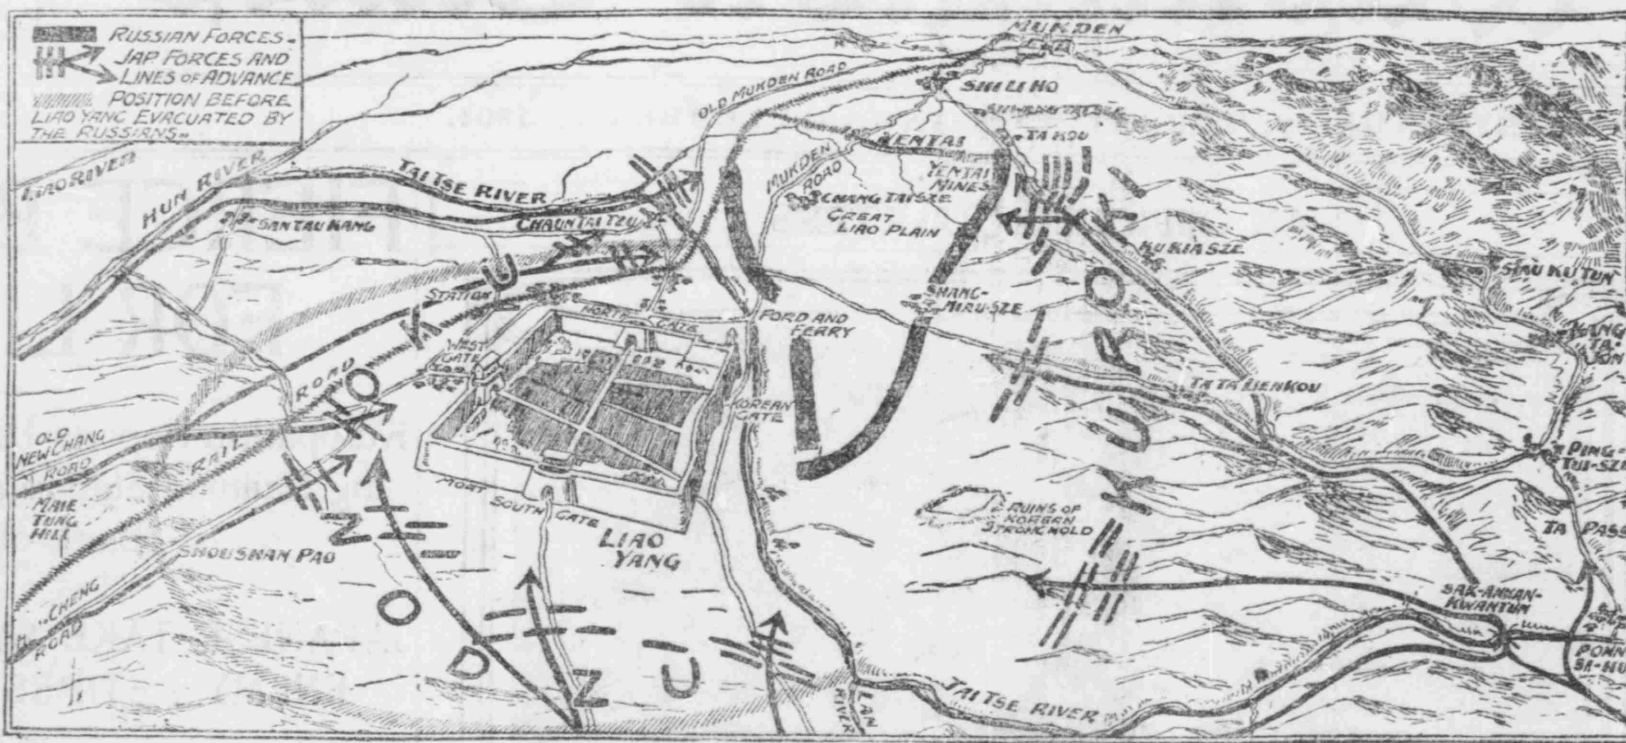

In the four months that it has taken the Mikado's forces to reach Liao-Yang from the river, not a serious check was suffered. The Japanese campaign has been a dashing one, but plans made long in advance have been carried out with deliberation and unbroken success.

The unexpected weakness of the Russian defense at the Yalu and other points may have, and probably did, tempt the Japanese commanders to throw away their carefully prepared plans of campaign, and chance success on a rush, but the temptation was resisted. When prepared to move the Japanese have gone ahead with irresistible force.

Plans Kept Secret.

When the war began in February there was much speculation as to the lines of attack the Japanese would adopt in the land campaign. It soon

WHERE KUROPATKIN IS FIGHTING TO SAVE ARMY

The situation around Liao-Yang has not materially changed, according to the meager advices received from Tokyo and St. Petersburg.

The decisive portion of the desperate battle is being fought at Yentai, twelve miles northeast of Liao-Yang. There General Kuroki's flanking column renewed its attack, which had been carried far into Thursday night, at dawn Friday.

Unless Kuropatkin succeeds in repulsing this attack, his army will be in the greatest peril. Should Kuroki succeed in occupying the railway leading to Mukden with a considerable force Kuropatkin's line of retreat and his communications would be cut off.

The Russians still contend that Kuropatkin's strongest positions are on the right bank of the Taitsie, and that he can crush Kuroki before aid can reach him. Practically all of Kuropatkin's forces are available for use against the flanking column, and the Taitsie River is so swollen by floods that it could not be crossed, in the face of a heavy Russian fire, anywhere near Liao-Yang.

Consequently, it would take some time for the Japanese armies to combine.

Oku and Nodzu were reported to have joined for the purpose of driving the Russian rear guard from the strong fortifications at Liao-Yang. The Tokyo officials thought the Russians had been forced into the flooded river, and that a tragedy of historic horror had been enacted.

It is not certain, however, that the Russians have abandoned the town. Outlying villages, where the Russians kept their stores, were reported to have been fired, to prevent the munitions falling into the hands of the Japanese.

What was accomplished by the fighting of yesterday is unknown. No reports of the battle were received at St. Petersburg, although the officials there declared that the telegraph line was still open.

They also said the railroad was again working to the south of Mukden, and that by his retreat Kuropatkin had escaped being bottled up in Liao-Yang, as was Marshal Bazaine, at Metz.

more than 500 dead on the field, and it is believed that his total casualties reached 5,000.

Before this General Nodzu had landed with the third Japanese army at Tashkent, midway between the mouth of the Yalu and the Liaotung Peninsula. He advanced northwesterly on the road toward Hsinyang and on June 7 drove the Russians from the important position at Shiao.

Carry Motion Pass.

In the latter part of June General Kuroki and Nodzu co-operated in one of the most important movements of the campaign. Kuroki moved forward on the roads to Anping and Liao-Yang, capturing the important Motion Pass, where the Russians expected to check him.

At the same time Nodzu took the Fenchu Pass, giving him command of the roads to Kaijing (Kiaochow) and Hsinyang. That Kuroki's victory was a severe blow to the Russians was shown by their desperate attempt on July 17 to retake Motion Pass. Kuropatkin attacked with 20,000 men and waged a fifteen-hour battle, but was unequal to the task and again fell back. Kuroki followed this up quickly, and in the succeeding two days drove the Russians farther back toward Anping.

Improving his own position for the final movement on Liao-Yang.

Nodzu was not idle. Early in July he cleared the hills in front of him of Russians in a series of assaults, and on the 8th entered Kaijing, just south of Hsinyang.

Battle of July 25.

Oku meanwhile had been advancing northward along the peninsula, and found the Russians in force at Tashkent. After three days of fighting, principally with artillery, he drove the enemy back on July 25. This left a clear road to the left of Nisuchang. The Russians abandoned this important point and a small body of Japanese took possession, while Oku, with his main force, joined Nodzu for the taking of Hsinyang.

Nodzu had taken the Simucheng heights after severe fighting. A general bombardment of Hsinyang was begun on August 1, and the Russians lost a valuable field officer in Gen. Count Keller. Next day the Russians retreated to Anshunghuan, where they in turn abandoned when the three Japanese armies began two weeks ago the advance, which brought on the battle of Liao-Yang.

The generally accepted figures of the Japanese armies have been, Kuroki, 100,000; Nodzu, 30,000; and Oku, 50,000.
